Not illustrated. 1848 Excerpt: .When taken, the sea-serpent was in hot pursuit of them for a luncheon. We have seen a bass, in Catherine market, New York, which weighed sixty-four pounds, and the man who had it for sale informed us that he, a few years since, cut one up that weighed eighty-three pounds. And while upon the subject of fish stories, we must be permitted to mention a single fact, which occurred in our presence a few days since. Mr. Harrington, of the new hotel at Hull, was fishing for cod and haddock off George s Island. He pulled up, within fifteen minutes of each other, two mammoth sculpins, which looked enough alike to be twins, as aunt Deborah used to say. They measured two feet in length, and weighed about twelve pounds a piece. As we had never read of nor seen such non-descripts, we had the curiosity to examine their bodies after death. We found in the ponch of one of them, among other tilings, four large sized crabs, and a tape-worm four feet long--its liver was of a deep yellow, an inch thick, six inches long and four wide--in its jaws were several rows of well set teeth, giving the fish great power. In the ponch of the other, we found two large flounders, in a state of partial decomposition, but nothing else remarkable--its liver was more healthy than that of the other, which no doubt had been troubled with the liver complaint for some time,...
