After detailing several novelties of practice and worship introduced in New York and Brooklyn, he instances St. Lukes Church in Hudson Street, of whose rector he says: I think I told you Mr. Forbes has early communion every Sunday except the second in the month, and recommends and hears confessions. He is gaining the influence which Dr. Seabury is losing at the seminary. With the fading of that hope which once led him on, the hope of engrafting something higher and better on the dead branches of Anglicanism, comes the necessity of doing something else. Either one must go forward to Rome or settle down to rest where one is. But, for a true man, there is no rest without work. McVickars letters show that he now began to feel it necessary to take orders, and find for himself occupation in the Anglican ministry. At the same time he shows a great desire to engage Wadhams to enter into some new and larger field of ministerial labor which might serve to tranquillize him. He suggests that Dr. Whittingham, bishop of Maryland, was in search of clergymen. He writes: Bishop McCoskey, I understand, says he could fill twenty stations if he had the men. He then adds: Bishop Ives has just called here. I mentioned your name to him. He is in want, he says, of some...
