On the left, a section of the prothallus in which the egg cell is buried and covered by the tubular archegonium. On the right, the free-swimming sperm cells escaping from the antheridium. When the sex cells are ripe, the access of water causes both structures to open; the archegonium releases into the water a substance (malic acid) very attractive to the sperm cells, which swim towards it, and enter the tube, when the first to reach the egg cell fuses therewith and effects fertilization. (After L. Kny.) itself develops in a special structure (Fig. 218); and then the developing embryo is supplied with food by the parent plant. Here is evidently represented still another stage in the evolution of sex, in which have been developed, above the earlier differences, special and different structures, which protect the sex cells in ways to facilitate the access of the free sperm cell to the fixed egg cell. VI. The highest development of sex in plants is represented in the construction of the flower, as described in an earlier section (page 269). Here fertilization is effected, not in water by a free-swimming sperm cell, as in all earlier stages, but in the air by wind-or insect-carried pollen grains from which the pollen tubes carry the sperm cells to the egg cells. In correspondence with the dry and exposed surroundings, the egg cell is deeply buried within the body of the parent plant, --within an...
